The Adobe Bridge The Adobe Bridge is an interface that enables you to manage and move your digital files. The Adobe Bridge enables you to move images back and forth between your computer and Adobe Photoshop, either as a single file or as a package of multiple files. It also allows you to synchronize the same image, on your computer, on your computer network, and on the Adobe website. You also can share your files with others on your network. The Adobe Bridge can manage files stored on an external hard drive, optical disc, or network drive, and it can be used to move files from a network, including from a digital camera, digital camcorder, scanner, or other multifunction device. The Adobe Bridge is not the same as the File menu in Adobe Photoshop. While the File menu is built into Photoshop, the Adobe Bridge does not require that you use the File menu to move files. You can use the Adobe Bridge to move any file you have on your computer, whether it is in your Adobe Photoshop folder, an external hard drive or optical disc, or a network drive. The Adobe Bridge is the result of years of research and development as the industry standard interface for digital photography and digital imaging technology. The information in this section is based on the information available to Microsoft Windows users.

Computer-aided diagnosis of facial nerve neuromas in B cell chronic lymphocytic leukaemia. Facial nerve neuromas (FNs) may result in facial paralysis, which is a challenging problem. The objective of this study was to develop a computer-aided diagnosis (CAD) system for the detection of FN in the brainstem of patients with B cell chronic lymphocytic leukaemia (B-CLL) using a binormal test with artificial neural networks (ANN). Fourteen computed tomography (CT) brain-stages from two public repositories were used, and were labelled with the radiologists' consensus and labelled with a recently developed technique of neuroma segmentation on ultra-high-resolution magnetic resonance imaging (MRI). A total of 20 hemi-brain-stems from 15 out of 18 patients with B-CLL were selected. The segmented images were used to develop a binormal test, and the results were fed into an artificial neural network. The system successfully detected FN in 11 out of 12 patients at the patient-specific level, yielding an area under the curve (AUC) of 0.98. The preliminary results show the potential to develop a CAD system for the detection of FN, which may be useful in the monitoring of patients with B-CLL. Factors determining the nature of cerebral vasospasm after aneurysmal subarachnoid hemorrhage. The nature of cerebral vasospasm in a series of 100 patients with subarachnoid hemorrhage has been investigated and is found to correlate with the volume of blood initially injected. The percentage of spasm has been shown to increase rapidly with an increasing volume of blood injected in the first 4 hours, after which it tends to remain stable. There is also a gradual decrease in spasm, probably due to a reduction in the blood pressure following surgery, when the volume of blood exceeds 30 ml. The importance of selecting the treatment and follow-up periods on a patient-by-patient basis is discussed in relation to the nature of vasospasm. Correlation of FDG-PET/CT with tumor-node-metastasis stage in gastric cancer patients. Both 18F-fluorodeoxyglucose positron emission tomography (FDG-PET) and computed tomography (CT) are used for assessment of gastric cancer. However, the correlation of maximum standardized uptake values (SUVmax) obtained by FDG-PET

Direct and indirect mediation of fear by the amygdala. The amygdala has been implicated in the mediation of fear in numerous studies, yet the precise manner in which it engages in such mediation is still under debate. In particular, it is not clear whether fear is facilitated directly by excitation of input cells in the amygdala, or indirectly via inhibition of an inhibitory system in a feedback circuit, or even both. Here, to shed some light on this question, we systematically manipulated the functional integrity of the amygdala by disrupting the cholinergic input and/or the glutamatergic/gamma-aminobutyric acid (GABA(A)) input to the amygdala in male rats before fear-conditioning using contextual fear conditioning. We demonstrate that cholinergic and glutamatergic/GABA(A) inputs to the amygdala are necessary and sufficient for context-triggered fear memory formation, and that input cell firing in the amygdala is sufficient to trigger an inhibitory response in the central amygdala. To explain the latter, we propose a neural circuit model of the direct and indirect mediation of fear by the amygdala. Live polling is expected to pick up in the Kerala Congress-Mani follow-up to the Left Democratic Front (LDF) victory in the 2014 general election. The LDF lost on the majority vote in the two-phased election. "We expect to get a respectable win next time," said LDF leader Ramesh Chennithala. He told TNM he expected to get over 15% vote share. With the Congress-led United Democratic Front (UDF) leading in opinion polls, party activists were jittery over the early verdict, which seemed to have stifled the party's campaign strategy. LDF leader Chennithala said a slow campaign was key to their win. "We started campaigning a month ago, as with the Kerala school of thought we continued till the last day of the election," he said. "The campaign was relatively slow and focussed." In the second phase of the polls on April 23, the LDF recorded a victory and took over from the UDF, with 34.85% of the votes polled. "We started campaigning a month ago. We were a little slower than the other parties... The election campaign focused on three pillars — welfare, corruption and misrule," said Chennithala
